	CORRIGENDA TO VOLUME I	xiv
7	GENERAL WELFARE AND PARTICULAR PURPOSES	I
	In a free society the general good consists principally in the facilities for the pursuit of unknown purposes	I
	The general interest and collective goods	6
	Rules and ignorance	8
	The significance of abstract rules in a world in which most of the particulars are unknown	11
	Will and opinion, ends and values, commands and rules, and other terminological issues	12
	Abstract rules operate as ultimate values because they serve unknown particular ends	15
	The constructivist fallacy of utilitarianism	17
	All valid criticism or improvement of rules of conduct must proceed within a given system of rules	24
	'Generalization' and the test of universalizability	27
	To perform their functions rules must be applied throughout the long run	29
8	THE QUEST FOR JUSTICE	31
	Justice is an attribute of human conduct	31
	Justice and the law	34
	Rules of just conduct are generally prohibitions of unjust conduct	35
	Not only the rules of just conduct, but also the test of their justice, are negative	38
	The significance of the negative character of the test of injustice	42

 APPENDIX TO CHAPTER 9 JUSTICE AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS	 101
 10 THE MARKET ORDER OR CATALAXY	 107
The nature of the market order	107
A free society is a pluralistic society without a common hierarchy of ends	109
Though not a single economy, the Great Society is still held together by what vulgarly are called economic relations	112
The aim of policy in a society of free men cannot be a maximum of foreknown results but only an abstract order	114
The game of catallaxy	115
In judging the adaptations to changing circumstances comparisons of the new with the former position are irrelevant	120
Rules of just conduct protect only material domains and not market values	123

CONTENTS

The correspondence of expectations is brought about by a disappointment of some expectations	124
Abstract rules of conduct can determine only chances and not particular results	126
Specific commands ('interference') in a catallaxy create disorder and can never be just	128
The aim of law should be to improve equally the chances of all	129
The Good Society is one in which the chances of anyone selected at random are likely to be as great as possible	132
 II THE DISCIPLINE OF ABSTRACT RULES AND THE EMOTIONS OF THE TRIBAL SOCIETY	 133
The pursuit of unattainable goals may prevent the achievement of the possible	133
The causes of the revival of the organizational thinking of the tribe	134
The immoral consequences of morally inspired efforts	135
In the Great Society 'social justice' becomes a disruptive force	137
From the care of the most unfortunate to the protection of vested interests	139
Attempts to 'correct' the order of the market lead to its destruction	142
The revolt against the discipline of abstract rules	143
The morals of the open and of the closed society	144
The old conflict between loyalty and justice	147
The small group in the Open Society	149
The importance of voluntary associations	150
