Introduction 1

PART I: INTERGALACTIC TRAVELERS

BY FINN K. AND JAN COHEN-CRUZ

The story of a relationship born of a prison theater workshop, told from two perspectives.

1. Beginnings 9

How Finn and I came to be part of the Trenton State Prison drama workshop—he as an incarcerated participant, joining the workshop to overcome what he describes as his false selves, and I as cofacilitator and member of a street theater troupe.

2. Backstories 14

Finn and I delve into our soberingly different backgrounds—his, a violent family and childhood; mine, loving and full of opportunities but nonetheless stiflingly middle-class—which led us both to leave home at fifteen and join the workshop in our early twenties.

3. The Workshop 23

The fascinating and diverse core participants who got to know one another as human beings, devising scenes from personal experience. The difference between how I imagined people in a maximum-security prison and who they actually were. The tension between collectivity and a self-serving ethos.

4. Intensification 29
Trust and affection build from making theater together. The temporary closure of the prison to outsiders turned Finn and me to letter writing, deepened our relationship, and made the workshop, when it returned, more precious. The street theater director purchased a house so core participants leaving prison could live with us and continue the work.
5. Performances 42
The workshop developed productions that we shared with the prison population, ranging from a collection of scenes and poetry to Kafka's The Trial, adapted to participants' experiences.
6. The Year of Living Way Too Dangerously 58
Incompatible ways of balancing personal needs, a series of bad decisions in response to impossible circumstances, and the prison administration's concern over the unity of inmates of different backgrounds in the group led to the workshop's demise.
- Coda. Afterlives 74
A reflection on how the workshop influenced Finn's life and mine over the fifty years that followed, including our abiding commitment to collectivity and our enduring friendship.
- PART II: EXPANDING UNIVERSES
Five dialogues about different kinds of relationships born of prison theater workshops.
7. Life and Love in the LCIW Drama Club 81
by Ausetua AmorAmenkum, Kathy Randels, and Gloria "Mama Glo" Williams
How each of the authors came to the Louisiana Correctional Institute for Women Drama Club—Randels through research for a solo performance about her own untapped rage; AmorAmenkum as an extension of her pan-African

- community and spiritual values; and Mama Glo to give and receive communal healing through sharing and enacting personal stories after ten years' of solitary confinement and continued incarceration.
8. Opposite Sides of the Table 103
by Jess Thorpe and George Ferguson
Theater facilitator Thorpe and prison manager Ferguson reflect on how they arrived at a meeting of minds that made their collaboration in a juvenile facility possible, and how Ferguson came to support this work wholeheartedly. Subjects include rehabilitation versus punishment and both the benefits and risks of theater in carceral spaces.
9. At a Threshold Around Race 119
by Alexander Anderson and Kevin Bott
Anderson, who is Black, was a formerly incarcerated participant in Ritual4Return (R4R), which Bott, who is white, conceived to ease people's transitions from prison to a return to their communities. Bott and Anderson, now R4R's codirectors, explore their long relationship, focusing on how white supremacy damaged their collaboration, and efforts to repair that now.
10. The Lives We Lived 137
by John Bergman and Saul Hewish
Bergman and Hewish reflect on work they did together with Geese Theatre, one of the first companies to offer performances and workshops with incarcerated people in the United States and the United Kingdom, questions it evoked, and the effect of longtime work in prisons on all involved.
11. Unshackling the Body, Mind, and Spirit: Reflections on Liberation and Creative Exchange between San Quentin and Auckland Prisons 153
by Rand Hazou and Reginold Daniels

An adaptation of the authors’ analytical essay about a workshop that Daniels, a formerly incarcerated Black American, facilitated in a New Zealand prison with the help of Rand, a Palestinian-Kiwi scholar-practitioner. Emphasizes links between liberation, creativity, and love.

12. Roundtable 171

with Ausettua AmorAmenkum, Alexander Anderson, John Bergman, Kevin Bott, Jan Cohen-Cruz, Saul Hewish, Kathy Randels, Jess Thorpe, and Gloria “Mama Glo” Williams

A discussion of themes running through Part II and the directions to which these chapters point that most stood out to these contributing writers.
