INTRODUCTION

xxxix

CHAPTER ONE

THE EYE, in which we are supposing the human vision of the world to be pedestrian ripening of a long interval of monkeying around with a view that was fishy to begin with 3

CHAPTER TWO

A SENSE OF PLACE, a collation of events and processes which together ensure uniqueness and difference in an environment always in danger of slacking off into insipidity 28

CHAPTER THREE

THE IMAGE OF THE GARDEN, which argues that men's best communication to one another about the nature of the world is made in garden art, and that the message is Mama 65

CHAPTER FOUR

THE ITINERANT EYE, wherein travel is considered to be responsible for the idea of scenery—an abstraction necessary before some men could destroy nature or others could find it beautiful 119

CHAPTER FIVE

THE VIRGIN DREAM, or requiem for the now unfashionable idea that nature loves us, and will love us best when it comes to us undefiled 157

CHAPTER SIX

FELLOW CREATURES, an argument for killing them for their own good and ours 190

CHAPTER SEVEN

VARIETIES OF NATURE HATING, a chronicle of the times, an account of some of the ideas which, when pooled in one society, inspire sufficient motive for doing to our environment what we are doing 214

CHAPTER EIGHT

THE AMERICAN WEST, a case history holding that there is a value in the American wilderness discovered by some gentlemen who thought it looked like something else 238
