

Contents

Foreword by Judith Phillips	vi
Preface	vii
Introduction	ix
one Family practices and family relationships	1
two Families in later life	15
three Older parents and their adult children	27
four Long-lasting relationships	39
five Brothers and sisters	51
six Grandparenting	63
seven Later life widow(er)hood	75
eight Globalisation and transnational communities: implications for family life in old age	87
nine Changing times: older people and family ties	99
References	107
Index	121

As it turned out, her support led to innumerable breakfasts among the four of us discussing the organisation of the book, the different chapters we might include and who would take responsibility for what. The typescript was eventually completed, a little more slowly than we had hoped. We would probably all admit that there were times when writing a book with three other authors seemed unnecessarily onerous, far harder than writing a single-authored volume. But none of us really felt this way for long. The four of us have worked very well together, proving supportive and positive, even when being critical.

In addition to Emily, we would like to thank our colleagues at Keele University. Collectively they provide a highly supportive academic environment that we much appreciate. We would also like to thank those who love us, not least our partners. They have come to accept our need to work at unreasonable times without losing the ability to remind us that there are more important things in life than getting a paragraph, section or chapter finished. Graham would also like to express his