9 Analysing environmental justice: some conclusions	214
There is value in understanding exactly how social differentiation exists and how it is experienced in environmental terms	215
Environmental inequalities are constituted by more than spatial patterns of proximity and exposure	216
Recognising the methodological complexities and choices involved in generating empirical evidence is important in progressing understanding and in doing justice	216
It is necessary to distinguish between inequality and injustice and to reason carefully about why an inequality matters and to whom	217
Environmental justice is about more than just patterns of distribution; procedure, recognition and their detail, also matter	218
Environmental justice is contested and involves political challenges	219
Environmental justice is an objective but also a process of 'working towards'	220
