Google and the search for a theory of harm 149

The Commission has published its June 2017 Google decision, thus exposing it to scrutiny. While the work undertaken by the EU Commission is impressive and bold, much of the legal dimension of the decision bears discussion. Moreover, the case has been redacted significantly, thus leaving open the door for additional cases and fines.

New act on contractual advantage in the trade in agricultural and food products in Poland 152

The article presents the new Polish act on counteracting the unfair use of contractual advantage in the trade in agricultural and food products. It discusses the scope of application of the Act, definition of the contractual advantage and basic types of its unfair use, as well as institutional and procedural provisions.

The stories merger documents tell—the US, EU, Asia, Brazil, Mexico, and South Africa perspectives 161

Merger Control filings around the world often require the merging parties to submit extensive information about the proposed transaction. What if the review reveals issues that are not specific to the transaction at hand? Providing documents to enforcers or regulators, even where no initial wrongdoing is suspected, can carry serious criminal risks, and can also lead to significant criminal or civil fines—resulting in unintended consequences.

Excessive prices in the Pharmaceutical Sector: re-inventing United Brands as a fairness-mechanism 167

In May 2017 the Commission announced its investigation into pricing practices of Aspen after the CMA already fined Pfizer and Flynn for imposing unfair prices in December 2016. The inconsistencies in the decision-text of the CMA reveal the upcoming legal challenges for the Commission in fairly applying the United Brands-test.

Multi-homing in markets with network effects: what interpretation in a merger's context? 175

This article discusses the implications of multi-homing in the context of mergers in markets where network effects are present. We show, through illustrative examples, that the interpretation of multi-homing is more complex than suggested by the European Commission's assessment in recent cases.

The effect of article 9 decisions on contractual relations between undertakings 181

In Alrosa, the CJEU relaxed the proportionality test applied to art.9 commitment decisions. By packaging bad deals as commitments, undertakings can now escape liability for breach of contract. This article examines the consequences of Alrosa for third parties by reference to English contract law.

Report on the Lithuanian case on the prohibition of the merger of two pilsner malt producers 186

The Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania upheld the decision of the Lithuanian Competition Council on the prohibition of the merger of two pilsner malt producers in Lithuania. It was held that the merger would impede effective competition in the Lithuanian market of the production and sales of the pilsner malt.

Carving out non-economic objectives under section 9, chapter I Prohibition of the UK Competition Act 1998: What money can't buy 190

This article contends that the commercial justifications under s.9, c.I Prohibition of the UK Competition Act 1998 are in need of reform. It argues that the underlying economic principles are divorced from commercial reality, and that a broader concept of consumer welfare should be adopted to allow competition authorities to account for the non-economic utility of consumers.
