

CONTENTS

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO THE SERIES	vii
INTRODUCTION BY EDWIN W. PATTERSON	xxvii
TRANSLATOR'S NOTE	xli

I. EMIL LASK: LEGAL PHILOSOPHY

INTRODUCTION	3
I. THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE LAW	3
A. THE METHOD	3
Reality and value, 4; Legal philosophy as theory of typical values, 4; Formal natural law, 6; Material natural law, 7; Critical legal philosophy as a philosophy of positive law, 8; Historism, 10.
B. THE VARIOUS TRENDS	12
The problem of the value of the social: Kant v. Hegel, 13; Stammler as a Kantian, 14; Socialism and Kant, 14; The Social as a specific value: Hegelianism, 15; Ramifications of Hegelianism: Jhering, Gierke, 15; The specific social value of the law, 17; Hegel, 18; Tönnies, Simmel, 20; The idea of justice, 21; Hermann Cohen, 21; The position of the social in the system of typical values, 22.

II. THE METHODOLOGY OF LEGAL SCIENCE 23

Cultural sciences: historical and systematic, 24; Scientific and prescientific thought, 25; Legal science as a systematic cultural science, 26; The dualism in legal science: law as cultural meaning and as cultural reality, 27; Jurisprudence and social theory of law, 28; Relation between the Ought and the Is, 29; Legal science and prescientific thought, 30; Legal science as a teleological science, 30; Objective law and subjective rights in legal science, 32; Legal science and psychology, 34; Legal science and ethics, 35; The problem of legal personality, 35; Gierke and Laband, 36; The independence of jurisprudence as a science, 37; Jurisprudence and statutes, 38; Jurisprudence and the non-juridical scientific systems, 38; Legal history, 39; Comparative law; "General theory of law," 39.

II. GUSTAV RADBRUCH: LEGAL PHILOSOPHY

AUTHOR'S PREFACE	47
SECTION 1. REALITY AND VALUE	49
Value-blind, evaluating, value-relating, value-conquering, 49; legal science, legal philosophy, religious philosophy of the law, 51.
SECTION 2. LEGAL PHILOSOPHY AS THE EVALUATING VIEW OF LAW	53
Methodical dualism, 53; Relativism, 55.
SECTION 3. THE TRENDS OF LEGAL PHILOSOPHY	59
Natural law doctrine, 59; Historical school, 61; Hegel, 62; Marx-Engels: materialistic view of history, 63; General theory of law, 65; Jhering, 66; Stammler, 68; Relativism, 69; Cultural philosophy, 69; Other trends in the legal philosophy of the present, 70.
SECTION 4. THE CONCEPT OF LAW	72
Law: the reality directed toward the idea of law, 73; Justice as the idea of law, 73; Equity, 75; Derivation of the concept of law, 76; A priori legal concepts, 77.
SECTION 5. LAW AND MORALS	78
Outwardness and inwardness of the directions of interest, 78; Outwardness and inwardness as to the subjects of purposes, 80; Outwardness and inwardness of the modes of obligation, 81; Norm and imperative, 82; Outwardness and inwardness of the sources of validity, 83; Morals as the ground of the validity of law, 84; Morals as the goal of law, 85.
SECTION 6. LAW AND CUSTOM	87
Antinomic character of custom, 88; Social function of custom, 89.
SECTION 7. THE PURPOSE OF LAW	90
Individual values, collective values, work values, 91; Three alternatives of world outlook, 92; Three views of the law, 94; Dialectic relation of the three views of the law, 95; The trans- personal view in particular, 96.
SECTION 8. LEGAL PHILOSOPHICAL THEORY OF PARTIES	97
Significance of the party ideologies, 98; Individualism, 98; The concept of the individual, 99; Liberalism and democracy, 101; Social view of the law, and socialism, 103; Conservatism, 104; Political Catholicism, 106.
SECTION 9. ANTINOMIES OF THE IDEA OF LAW	107
Justice, expediency, legal certainty, 107; Tensions between the the three ideas of legal value, 109; Antinomic character of legal philosophy, 111.

CONTENTS

XV

SECTION 10. THE VALIDITY OF LAW	112
Juridical doctrine of validity, 112; Sociological doctrine of validity, 114; The power theory, 114; The recognition theory, 115; Philosophical doctrine of validity, 116; Antinomies of the doctrine of validity, 118.
SECTION 11. PHILOSOPHY OF HISTORY AND THE LAW	120
The law as a form of culture, 120; Form and material of the law, 120; The realization of the idea of law, 123; Deliberate and unconscious development of the law, 123; Theory of legitimacy and theory of catastrophes, 124.
SECTION 12. RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHY OF THE LAW	126
Early Christianity, 126; Tolstoy, 127; Catholicism, 128; Reformation: Luther, 128.
SECTION 13. THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE MAN OF THE LAW	130
Objective law as a form of life, 130; Subjective right as a form of life, 133; Sense of law and conscience, 134.
SECTION 14. AESTHETICS OF THE LAW	137
Art of the law: aesthetics of forms of legal expression, 137; The law in the arts: law as an artistic subject, 139.
SECTION 15. THE LOGIC OF LEGAL SCIENCE	140
Legal science and sciences concerned with law, 140; Interpretation, 141; Construction and systematization, 146; Legal concepts, 148; Legal science as an understanding cultural science, 149; "With a stroke of the legislator's pen . . .," 150; Turning to special problems, 151.
SECTION 16. PRIVATE AND PUBLIC LAW	152
A priori character of these concepts, 152; Liberal view, 153; Conservative and social views, 154; Social law, 154.
SECTION 17. THE PERSON	156
Person as a concept of equality, 156; Teleological interpretation of the problem of the legal person, 157; Savigny, Gierke, Brinz, 159; Individualistic fiction theory, transindividualistic real group person, transpersonal property with a purpose, 159.
SECTION 18. OWNERSHIP	160
A priori character of the concept of ownership, 160; Theories of occupation and of specification, 161; Individualistic theory of ownership: Goethe, 162; Individualistic theory of ownership: Fichte, 165; Social theory of ownership: Encyclical Quadragesimo Anno; Constitution of Weimar, 166.

SECTION 19. CONTRACTS	168
Statics and dynamics of life under the law, 168; The social contract and the contracts of private law: fictitious elements of the contract, 169; Will theory and declaration theory, 170.
SECTION 20. MARRIAGE	172
The problem: the social substratum of the law of marriage, 173; The transindividualistic view of marriage: the Encyclical Casti Connubii, 175; The transindividualistic view of marriage: the Constitution of Weimar, 175; The individualistic view of marriage, 177; Soviet Russia; law of marriage and socialism, 178.
SECTION 21. THE LAW OF INHERITANCE	180
Freedom of testation, intestacy, compulsory distribution and consolidation of estates, 180; Individualistic view, 181; Trans-individualistic and transpersonal view, 182.
SECTION 22. THE PENAL LAW	184
The justification of punishment, 184; Theories of consent and of retaliation, 184; The end of punishment, 185; Penal law and justice: commutative and distributive, 186; penal law and expediency: theory of general prevention, 187; Expediency: theory of special prevention, 188; Expediency: Fascist penal law, 188; Expediency: Soviet penal law, 189; Penal law and legal certainty, 190.
SECTION 23. THE DEATH PENALTY	191
Transindividualistic justification, 191; Death penalty and contract theory: Beccaria, Rousseau, Kant, 191; Death penalty as self-defense, 194.
SECTION 24. MERCY	195
Mercy as a legal institution, 196; Mercy before law, 197.
SECTION 25. PROCEDURE	198
Judicial independence, 198; The procedural legal relation, 199; Res judicata, 200.
SECTION 26. A GOVERNMENT OF LAWS	201
Priority of the law or the state, 201; Identity of the state and the law, 202; Self-obligation of the state by law, 204; Solution of the problem: obligation by transpositive legal rule, 205; Value of a formal government of laws, 206.
SECTION 27. ECCLESIASTICAL LAW	207
Catholicism, 207; Sohm, Tolstoy, 208; Luther 209; Constitution of the Evangelical Church, 211.

CONTENTS

xvii

SECTION 28. THE LAW OF NATIONS 212

The problem, 213; Individualism: the World State, 213; Transindividualism: the dogma of sovereignty and the denial of the law of nations, 214; Transpersonalism: law of nations and League of Nations, 217; The reality of the law of nations, 218.

SECTION 29. WAR 219

Ethics of war, 220; Legal philosophy of war, 220; Historical philosophy of war, 221; Religious philosophy of war, 223.

III. JEAN DABIN: GENERAL THEORY OF LAW

FOREWORD 227

PART ONE. THE CONCEPT OF LAW

INTRODUCTION 229

(1) Justifying the title, 229; (2) Choosing a starting point, 230; (3) Adopting the idea of "the rule"; philological considerations, 230; (4) The objective or normative, as against the subjective, sense of the lawful, 231; (5) As usually understood, the rule called "law" bears upon relationships between men, 233; (6) Defining the legal rule, 234; (7) Plan of the first part of the book, 234.

I. FORMAL DEFINITION OF THE LEGAL RULE 235

SECTION 1. THE LAW AS THE RULE OF CIVIL SOCIETY 235

(8) Law implies societal life, 235; (9) Why societal life requires law, 235; (10) The different kinds of societies, 237; (11) Each kind of society has its system of law, 237; (12) Distinct and eminent place of the law of civil society, 238; (13) The law of the civil society is nonetheless a societal law, 239; (14) The other rules of social life (morals, manners) are not societal, 240; (15) Customary law has societal character, 241.

SECTION 2. POWER AS THE SOURCE OF THE LEGAL RULE 243

(16) Power alone is qualified to lay down the legal rule, 243; (17) The courts, creating case law, constitute power, 244; (18) Custom needs the approval of power, 245; (19) Diversity and hierarchy of the rules according to the creating organ, 247; (20) The rules laid down by private individuals do not constitute law, 248; (21) Transformation of rules of private parties into law of the state, 250.

SECTION 3. LAW AND PUBLIC COMPULSION 250

(22) As regards its execution, law is guaranteed by the state, 250; (23) Law that is not obeyed does not lose its validity as law, 251; (24) Abrogation of statute law by contrary custom, 252; (25) Special case of desuetude, 252; (26) In general, the law is obeyed, 253; (27) Sanction and compulsion, 254; (28) Punishment and compulsion, 255; (29) Variety of the forms of compulsion, 256; (30) Specific characteristics of legal compulsion, 257; (31) Special cases of legal rules without compulsion, 258; (32) Insufficiency of the formula "tendency toward compulsion," 258; (33) Legal compulsion as the monopoly of the state, 259; (34) Special cases of private compulsion, 260; (35) Disciplinary power of private bodies, 260; (36) The rules of public law by which the state and authority are constituted, 261; (37) The rules of public law governing the activities of those who hold authority, 262; (38) Public international law: the lack of compulsion, 263; (39) Public international law (continued): absence of an international public society, 264; (40) International custom is subordinate to the category of law, 265.

II. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE LEGAL RULE 266

(41) Plan of this chapter, 266.

SECTION 1. THE LAW AS A PRECEPTIVE, CATEGORICAL RULE OF CONDUCT 267

(42) The two constitutive elements of every rule: hypothesis and solution, 267; (43) The legal solution is a norm, 268; (44) Criticism of the contrary view (Zitelmann), 269; (45) The legal rule is always a norm of conduct, 269; (46) Criticism of contrary views (Jèze, Burckhardt, R. Capitant), 270; (47) The legal rule imposes a precept and not advice, 271; (48) A precept underlies the disposing and the permissive rules, 272; (49) The supplementing laws, 273; (50) The "directives" or "standards," 274; (51) The imperative character of the law does not exclude waivers, 274; (52) The legal imperative is categorical and not conditional or technical, 275; (53) The sanction does not transform the categorical into the hypothetical, 277; (54) The imperative remains categorical even in "risk legislation," 278; (55) The categorical imperative of the law is binding in the external and the internal forums, 279.

SECTION 2. THE LAW AS A GENERAL RULE 281

(56) The thesis of the advocates of the individual legal rule, 281; (57) Criticism of the above thesis, 282; (58) The objection concerning the contract with the force of law, 284.

CONTENTS

xix

SECTION 3. THE LAW AS A SYSTEMATICAL RULE: THE LEGAL INSTITUTIONS 284

(59) The rule as institution and the state as institution, 284; (60) Definition of the legal institution, 285; (61) Hierarchical arrangement of the rules grouped under the institution, 286; (62) Regrouping of the institutions in higher syntheses, 287; (63) The legal institutions and logic, 288.

III. THE SUBJECT MATTER OF THE LAW 289

(64) In general, 289.

SECTION 1. EXCLUSION OF INNER ACTS: DUTIES TOWARDS GOD AND DUTIES TOWARDS ONESELF 289

(65) The inner acts are subject to morals, 289; (66) The inner acts are not subject to the law as a social discipline, 290; (67) Application of this idea; the "pedagogical function" of the laws, 291; (68) In what sense the law is concerned with intentions, 292; (69) Of the prudence required in the search for intention, 293; (70) The relations of man with God are as such outside the competence of the law, 294; (71) Exceptions: incidence of the spiritual upon the temporal, 294; (72) The law takes no cognizance of the duties of man towards himself, 295; (73) Reservation of the principle of incidence "ad alterum," 296.

SECTION 2. THE SOCIAL RELATIONS AND THE CONCEPT OF THE LEGAL RELATIONSHIP 297

(74) The state-societal character of the legal rule recalled, 297; (75) Universal competency of the legal rule in the field of human relations of the temporal order, 298; (76) Exception: relations of a spiritual nature, 298; (77) In what manner the law is concerned with friendship, 299; (78) The need for more precise explanation of "social relations," 301; (79) Summary of the various kinds of social relations, 302; (80) Attempt at a classification of these relations, 302; (81) Attitude and rôle of the law with regard to voluntary social relations, 303; (82) Attitude and rôle of the law with regard to other categories of relations, 305; (83) The objective and subjective interpretations of the "legal relationship," 305; (84) Critique of the subjective interpretation, 306; (85) The world of the law is not limited to a network of bonds between determinate persons, 308.

SECTION 3. THE DIFFERENT KINDS OF SOCIAL RELATIONS AND THE CORRESPONDING BRANCHES OF LAW 308

(86) The fundamental principle of division is given by the existence of the state, 308; (87) Public relations and public law, 309; (88) Why the expression "political" is preferable to "public," 309; (89) International relations and international law, 310; (90) Penal law and adjective law are only subsidiary laws, 311; (91) Private relations and private law, 311; (92) Maximum impact of the law upon its subject matter in the field of economic relations, 312; (93) Far less impact in the field of personal values, 313; (94) The same, in the field of the family, 314; (95) Cause of the relative powerlessness of the law in the field of political relations, 315; (96) The claim that the nation is not reducible to the legal rule, 316; (97) The illusion of the sufficiency of the legal order, 317.

PART TWO. THE LEGAL METHOD

I. IS THE LAW "GIVEN" OR "CONSTRUED," THE SUBJECT OF A SCIENCE OR OF A TECHNIQUE? 318

SECTION 1. STATE OF THE PROBLEM AND PRESENT THEORIES . . . 318

(98) Explanation of the terms "given" and "construed," 318; (99) Extent of the application of the idea of the "construed," 319; (100) Statement of the question, 320; (101) In its historical existence, the law is "given," 320; (102) But what about law in its essence? 321; (103) Attitude of legal positivism, and criticism, 322; (104) Everybody recognizes that in some part the law is "construed," 323; (105) The certain part of the "construed": formal sources; machineries; differentiations by enumeration, 323; (106) Divergence of opinions as to the nature and origin of the "given," 324; (107) The opinion of Duguit, 325; (108) Theories searching for the "given" of the law in popular feeling, 326; (109) The "given" of the law as a product of force, 327; (110) The "given" of the law as issuing from nature (natural law doctrines), 328.

SECTION 2. EXAMINATION OF THE THEORIES OF THE "GIVEN" (DUGUIT, GÉNY, ETC.) 329

(111) Return to the problem: is there a legal "given"? 329; (112) Critique of the doctrines of the popular "given," 330; (113) Critique of the doctrines of force, 332; (114) As for natural law, the question arises only with regard to juridical natural law, 332; (115) Nature furnishes the jurist with no juridical "given," no necessary rule, 333; (116) Undue and illogical extensions of the idea of the natural juridical "given," 335; (117) Difference between the pretended legal "given" and the "revealed given" of the theologians, 336; (118) Choice of concrete examples, 336; (119) Respect for ownership, 337; (120) Ownership is far from always enjoying the protection of the law, 338; (121) Freedom of contract, 339; (122) Reparation for injuries due to fault, 340.

CONTENTS

xxi

SECTION 3. THE LAW IS "PRUDENCE" AND CONSEQUENTLY CON- STRUED 341

(123) Conclusions reached concerning the legal "given," 341;
(124) The operations of the jurist belong to practical reason, especially to prudence, 342; (125) To say "prudent" is not to say "arbitrary," 344; (126) The factual presuppositions of the jurist's legal rule, 344; (127) Moral or technical precepts and existing law as presupposed facts, 346; (128) The kinds of the "given" enumerated by Gényn, 347; (129) The "given" of the method of elaboration of the law, 348; (130) The "given" of facts and of method: the idea of the "construed," 349.

II. THE GUIDING PRINCIPLES OF THE ELABORATION OF THE LAW 350

INTRODUCTION 350

(131) The end of the law and of its processes of realization, 350; (132) The instrumental character of the legal rule differ-entiates it from the moral rule, 351; (133) The moral rule is not concerned with processes of realization, 352.

Subdivision I. The End of the Legal Ordinance: the Temporal Public Good

(134) "Lex est Ordinatio ad Bonum Commune," 353.

SECTION 1. CONCEPT AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE TEMPORAL PUBLIC GOOD 354

(135) Definition of the adjective "public": that which concerns the public, 354; (136) The public good from a formal point of view, 355; (137) The constitutive elements of the public good: order, coördination, aid, 355; (138) The public good covers all human values of the temporal order, 357; (139) Domestic and international public good, 358; (140) Political and other values of the temporal order, 359; (141) Need for a philosophy of values to discern the requirements of the public good, 360; (142) Our philosophy of values, 361; (143) Primarily moral character of the notion of the public good, 361; (144) Relativity of the applications of the idea of the public good, 362.

SECTION 2. THE TEMPORAL PUBLIC GOOD AS NORM OF THE POSITIVE CONTENT OF THE LAW 363

(145) The temporal public good differs from morals; intersections, 363; (146) The norm of the public good governs all branches of the law, 364; (147) Private law and the public good, 364; (148) The social conception of private law and the concern with individual rights, 365; (149) The example of rent legislation, 366; (150) The objection of "legislation of circumstance,"

367; (151) Examples from the ordinary law of private institutions: prescription, 368; (152) The same: ownership under the Code Napoleon, 369; (153) The same: domestic relations, succession, contracts, 370; (154) In the field of evidence and procedure, 371; (155) In criminal law, 372.

SECTION 3. THE TEMPORAL PUBLIC GOOD AS NORM OF THE NEGATIVE CONTENT OF THE LAW 373

(156) The public good often demands abstention of the jurist, 373; (157) The dilemma: freedom or legal rule, 374; (158) Sometimes freedom ought to be preferred, but not without limit or control, 375; (159) Beneficial character of freedom even in the domain of public and administrative law, 376; (160) The psychology of the subjects: cases where the public good is satisfied without the intervention of a law, 376; (161) The same: cases where the order of the public good would meet with resistance, 377; (162) The intervention of the legal rule is not the only possible solution, 379; (163) The desirable public good and the realizable public good, 380; (164) Public good and public opinion as factors of the elaboration of the law, 381; (165) The "problem of interventionism" does not arise in morals, at least not in natural morals, 382.

Subdivision II. The Means: the Technical Equipment of the Law

INTRODUCTION 383

(166) The "formal realizability" or "practicability" of the law, 383; (167) The theoretical value of the rules is distinct from their "practicability," 383.

SECTION 1. THE DEFINITION, OR LEGAL CONCEPTUALISM 384

(168) Inconveniences of an insufficiently defined law, 384; (169) Lack of definition on the part of the formal sources of the law, 385; (170) Indeterminacy of the applicability of the law in time or space, 386; (171) The lack of precision of the law in its formal content, 387; (172) Examples: the injustice of usury or illicit speculation, 388; (173) Examples (continued): grave insult as a cause for divorce, 389; (174) Examples (continued): the aggressor in public international law, 390; (175) Special difficulty of definition of qualitative values, 391; (176) The system of broad definitions: advantages and inconveniences, 392; (177) Examples: public policy; article 1382 of the Code Napoleon, 393; (178) Examples in the field of public and administrative law, 394; (179) But not all matters lend themselves equally to broad definitions: the penal law, 394; (180) The jurist does not cease to search for the strict definition, 395; (181) Cases where

CONTENTS

xxiii

the law is obliged to renounce all definition, 396; (182) Summary of the technical processes of definition: simplification, 397; (183) Some artifices of simplification, 399.

SECTION 2. THE APTNESS FOR PROOF OF THE FACTS THAT ARE SUBJECT TO A RULE 400

(184) The social necessity of proof, 400; (185) The difficulties inherent in proof, 401; (186) Sometimes these difficulties may lead to total abstention by the law, 402; (187) The law eliminates the element resisting proof, 403.

SECTION 3. THE CONCENTRATION OF LEGAL MATTER 404

(188) Reduction of the mass of rules through classification, 404; (189) The process of "legal constructions," 405; (190) Preserving a just measure in evaluating "practicability," 406.

Conclusions on the Legal Method and Corollaries

SECTION 1. DUAL ASPECT OF TECHNIQUE IN THE LAW 407

(191) As to substance, a social and political technique; as to form, a logical technique, 407; (192) It is a mistake to reduce technique in the law to the sole idea of practicability, 407; (193) The law is not solely social science, 409; (194) The jurist knowingly deforms the real through his technique, 410.

SECTION 2. RELATIVE CERTAINTY AND VARIABILITY OF THE LAW 411

(195) As products of prudence legal solutions have only relative certainty, 411; (196) The different causes of variation of the law, 412; (197) The so-called "conservative function" of the law, 413; (198) Necessity of prudence in change, 414.

PART THREE.

NATURAL LAW, JUSTICE, AND THE LEGAL RULE

INTRODUCTION 416

(199) Statement of the problem, 416; (200) Objective value of the ideas of natural law and justice, 416.

I. THE CONCEPT OF NATURAL LAW 417

SECTION 1. THE TRADITIONAL CONCEPTION 417

(201) Natural law as a norm of human conduct, 417; (202) "Jus naturale" and "lex naturalis" are synonymous terms, 418; (203) Characteristics of natural law: a norm that issues from nature, universal and immutable, 419; (204) First principles and secondary precepts, 420; (205) Subject matter of natural law: the totality of the duties of man, 421; (206) Tendency to emphasize the duties "ad alterum," 421.

SECTION 2. IS THERE A JURIDICAL NATURAL LAW? 422

(207) The ambiguity of the concept of natural law, 422; (208) Historically, natural law provides principles of moral conduct, 423; (209) Natural law and special morals, 424; (210) Relationships between the natural moral rule and the legal rule, 424; (211) But these relationships entail no confusion of the disciplines, 425; (212) Extension of the concept of natural law: "natural jurisprudence," 426; (213) But this extension contradicts the original concept of natural law, 428; (214) The extension contradicts the concept of the legal rule, 429; (215) Moral and political but no juridical natural law, 430; (216) The dualism of "natural law — positive law" replaced by "morals — law," 431.

II. THE CONCEPT OF JUSTICE 431

SECTION 1. THE EXISTING CONCEPTIONS; ESPECIALLY, ON THE CONCEPTION OF ARISTOTLE AND ST. THOMAS AQUINAS 431

(217) The modern conception of justice as a specifically social and juridical value, 431; (218) According to tradition, justice is primarily a moral virtue, 433; (219) Justice in the broad sense of the good and the just, 434; (220) Justice in the strict sense of the virtue attributing to everyone his right, 435; (221) The wide interpretation of the debt of justice (the Stoics, Cicero), 436; (222) Distinction between the principal virtue (justice in the narrow sense) and the annexed virtues (Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas), 437; (223) Annexed virtues which fall short of justice on the score of equality, 437; (224) Annexed virtues which fall short on the score of the debt (moral, not legal debt), 439; (225) Justice in the strict sense must be defined by "aequalitas" rather than by the "aequum," 440; (226) In the case of justice, the "just mean" constitutive of all virtue is real or objective, 441; (227) Confusion to be avoided in interpreting the concept of the "real mean," 442.

SECTION 2. THE THREE KINDS OF JUSTICE 443

(228) Enumeration and classification, 443; (229) Commutative justice; its possible subjects: physical or moral persons, 443; (230) The object of commutative justice: the "suum" in its diverse forms, 444; (231) In commutative justice, equality is determined as of thing to thing, 445; (232) With distributive justice the societal plane is reached, 446; (233) The subject matter of distributive justice: the various kinds of distributions, 447; (234) Difference between distributive justice and commutative justice, 447; (235) Legal justice: its general concept, 448; (236) What the citizen owes the state as organization, 449; (237)

CONTENTS

XXV

What the individual owes the community organized in the state: "generality" of legal justice, 449; (238) In what legal or general justice remains special, 451; (239) Meaning of the adjective "legal" in the expression "legal justice," 452.

SECTION 3. THE NATURAL JUST AND THE POSITIVE JUST . . . 452

(240) The right of another is sometimes natural and sometimes positive, 452; (241) The distinction recurs in all the kinds of justice, 453; (242) Positive determination is not, however, arbitrary, 454; (243) The margin of indeterminacy in justice, 455.

III. THE "GIVEN" OF NATURAL LAW AND OF JUSTICE IN THE ELABORATION OF THE LAW . . . 455

(244) Restatement of the problem, 455.

SECTION 1. MORALITY AND THE TEMPORAL PUBLIC GOOD . . . 456

(245) There could be no public good against morals, 456; (246) Examples and cases of application, 457; (247) Confusions to be avoided in appraising the immoral character of laws, 458; (248) The law is not bound to consecrate every rule of morals, 459; (249) The "discipline of the laws" and virtue, 459; (250) The law and the ideal type of the family, 461; (251) The capacity of morals for "ordination to the public good," 461.

SECTION 2. JUSTICE AS THE NORMAL MATTER OF THE LEGAL RULE 462

(252) The moral precepts susceptible of consecration by the law, 462; (253) Justice as the precept most obviously fit for consecration, 463; (254) Exceptional rectification of the two particular justices on the ground of legal justice, 464; (255) Special structural adaptability of justice for the legal rule, 464; (256) Like the legal duty, the duty of justice is capable of exaction, 465; (257) The law and the annexed virtues of justice, especially faith in promises, 466; (258) The law and the constituent principles of the family, 467; (259) Yet the normal order of consecration is subject to derogation, 468; (260) Cases where the law abstains from consecrating justice, 468; (261) Cases where the law goes beyond the framework of justice, 469; (262) "Just laws" and laws consecrating justice are not synonymous, 470.