Contents

Preface ix
Acknowledgements x
Introduction: what this book stands for 1

1 Research methodology, teaching methodology, and educational values 4
1.1 Science, human science, and non-science 5
1.2 Social science and the methodology of teaching 11
1.3 Educational research and language-teaching methodology 17

2 Language and language acquisition: a contemporary view 23
2.1 The nature of human language 23
2.2 Language acquisition 30
2.3 Second-language acquisition 33

3 Language form and language value 39
3.1 An initial historical note 39
3.2 The case for a polarity 42

4 Accuracy and fluency 50
4.1 The basic polarity 50
4.2 Learning and teaching 57
4.3 An interim model of the language-teaching process 60

5 The bases for fluency activity: small-group work and a 'natural' linguistic environment 69
5.1 Classroom organisation 69
5.2 Group-work activity in education 71
5.3 Group work in foreign- and second-language learning 76
5.4 Fluency in comprehension 83
5.5 Fluency in writing 85
5.6 A 'natural' linguistic environment 87

6 The 'content' of language teaching: language and meaning 88
6.1 Process and product 88
6.2 Proposals for 'communicative' content 92
6.3 The Bangalore Project 101
6.4 Meaning and the language syllabus 109

7 Language learning as an integrated process 112
7.1 Context for an integrated model 112
7.2 The role of a product-based syllabus 115
7.3 Integration of the model 118

8 A fluency-based model of language-learning: problems and implications 126
8.1 Research and administration 126
8.2 Fluency distinguished from accuracy 129
8.3 Fluency and serious content 133

Notes 137
Chapter 1 137
Chapter 2 138
Chapter 3 139
Chapter 4 140
Chapter 5 141
Chapter 6 142
Chapter 7 143
Chapter 8 144

Appendix: Bangalore exercise 145
Bibliography 147
Index 163
Index of names 165