

contents

Introduction	1
Focus and scope	2
Why personalisation?	4
What is personalisation?	4
Taking stock of research	5
Summing up: directions for further research	14
Plan of the book	21
Chapter one: Institutions and personalisation	23
Prime ministers in parliamentary democracies	25
More candidate-centred electoral systems?	35
Summary and conclusions	40
Chapter two: Have individual candidates become more prominent?	41
Flexible-list systems	43
Systems with compulsory preference voting	49
Ticket-splitting in a mixed-member system: Germany	58
Systems without candidate choice: Britain and Norway	60
Summary and conclusions	62
Chapter three: Leaders and citizens	65
Previous research says 'no'	66
Research questions	68
Six parliamentary democracies, 1961–2001	69
Party switchers and party leaders	81
Summary and conclusions	84
Chapter four: How politics is presented: media and personalisation	85
Britain: Prime ministers in The Times	87
Sweden: party leaders, election campaigns and the press	93
Finland: campaign advertisements	96
Summary and conclusions	99
Conclusion: Is there a personalisation of politics?	101
No pervasive trend, many indications	101
Positive cases	102
Mixed-positive cases	103
Mixed-negative cases	104
Negative cases	105
Cases based on a single indicator	105
Reflections	106
Bibliography	109
Index	117