

CONTENTS

Chapter	Page
Introduction	7-12
 I. Conditions of the Permanence of International Law.
Spiritual Conditions	13-29
The relation between international law and education. The importance of ideologies for the permanence of international law. Means of education. State education and international education. International law as an active and creative factor of culture. The establishment of an International Institute of International Education. Moral idea as the foundation of international law.
 II. Material Conditions of the Permanence and Ob-
servation of International Law	30-42
Criticism of the present economic international law. The demand for universally controlled economics. The guaranty of peace in an international solution of the world economic problems. International law has so far had the character of Civil Law. World economic pro- blems. The creation of the world economic system.
 III. Political Conditions of the Permanence and the
Observation of International Law	43-57
The relation of the political organization of the States towards international law. International securing of the existence of democratic state constitutions. The political equilibrium of the Powers. The replacement of equilibrium by a new principle. International recognition of States and their regimes. The necessity of an organized, collective procedure. Intervention. The rejection of individual intervention and the necessity of collective intervention.

IV. The Theories of the Present International Law, their Criticism and the Necessity of a new Orientation 58-70

Destructive and positive theories. The theory denying the existence of international law. The theory demanding the recognition of international law by municipal law. The dualistic theory of the preeminence of municipal law. The dualistic theory of coordinated legal systems. The theory of the preeminence of international law. Monistic and dualistic theories. The necessity of a new orientation of the theory of international law.

V. Who is to be Bound by International Law?

A Chapter on the subjects or Bearers of International Rights and Obligations 71-80

The present bearers of international rights and duties. The transformation of international law. Contradictions between national and international laws. On the new subjects of international law. The necessity of a direct efficacy and of the binding force of international legal norms within the State. The rejection of the theory of transformation of international law into municipal law.

VI. What should be Regulated by International Law 81-86

The criticism of the former international law. Internal affairs of the State and international conflicts. The necessity of an international regulation of a number of internal problems of States. The spread of the competence of international law.

VII. The Binding Force of International Law . . 87-103

The theories of the binding force of international law. The subjectivistic and objectivistic theories. The voluntaristic theory. The theory of legal conviction and the theory of interests. The Theological School. The School of Natural Law. The Rationalistic School. Positivism. The Normative School. The binding force of the new international law.

VIII. Principles of International Law 104-144

The developmental character of international law. The principles on which international law was being built. The necessity of stability in international life. Natural rights. The destruction of the basis of international law, created by the doctrine of natural law, by positivism. The inconsistency of the positivists. The consequences of the denial of natural rights. International law remains a cultural possession. The impossibility of a return to natural rights. The vague natural rights should be replaced by the rights evolved from an international constitution. Interference of the international community in the state-sphere. The sovereignty of States and its practical consequences. The vagueness of the concept of sovereignty and the danger following therefrom for the Community of Nations. The principle of the sovereignty of States should be removed from international life. An analogy in municipal law.

IX. International Law and International Organization. 145-164

Law and social organizations. The present type of international community. A loose association of States should be replaced by a uniform worldwide organization. All States should participate. Civitas maxima and both practical and theoretical attempts at its creation. Absorptive hegemony of one State and the loose association of States should be rejected. Peace plans. A new international organization. The disciplined civitas maxima.

X. A World League of States as the Only Way to the Securing of Peace and to the Preservation of International Law. 165-206

The reasons for the rise of the new international organization. The necessity of a world-wide organization. Half-way solutions rejected. The initiative of the British Empire, the USA, the USSR and of China. The securing of the hegemony of the Allies by international law. Defeated States. The majority question. The imposing of peace stipulations. Leadership in international life.

The principle of the legal equality of States. The foundations of a new organization of the world. The advantages of the new organization. Self-aid. Criticism of self-aid. Justice should be brought into effect and attained collectively. Further advantages of a world-wide organization. A uniform universal legal territory. The merit of the Normative School. The world constitution will overcome the pluralism of municipal laws. Analogy in municipal law. Efforts aiming at the creation of international constitution. The position of the defeated States. The accomplishment of the development of international law.

XI. The Necessity for an International Penal Code 207-217

The lack of international penal code. The relation between the culprit and the international community. The real culprits of international crimes. The personal penal responsibility for international offences. Penal sanctions. Retroactivity of international penal norms. Who should be punished and what punishments should be inflicted.

XII. The Necessity for an International Legislation, Executive, and some Judicial Regulations, and the Possibility of their Organization 218-235

Associations of States into administrative unions. The defects of organization in the administrative unions. The construction of partial international organizations. The difficulties accompanying the rise of the international organizations. The organs of the international community. International conferences, world ministries, and world government. The international army. The necessity of an international tribunal. Negotiations, friendly offices and international arbitration. The defects of arbitration. The idea of proper tribunals victorious. The penal and civil international tribunals. The bringing into effect of judicial awards.

Conclusion 236-240

