

CONTENTS

PART ONE

HOUSEHOLD, CLAN, VILLAGE AND MANOR

	PAGE
CHAPTER I. AGRICULTURAL ORGANIZATION AND THE PROBLEM OF AGRARIAN COMMUNISM	3
The German agrarian organization, 3.—Settlement relations, 4.—Property relations, 7.—Class relationships in the peasantry, 8.—Spread of the Germanic settlement form, 10.—Westphalia, 11.—Alpine economy, 11.—The Zadruga, 12.—Vestiges of Roman field divisions, 12.—Origin and dissolution of the Germanic agrarian system, 12.—The Celtic agrarian organization, 15.—The Russian Mir, its effects on economic life and its origin, 17.—The Dutch-East-Indian field system, 21.—Chinese agrarian organization, 22.—Indian agrarian organization, 22.—The German Gehöferschaft , 23.—The theory of primitive agrarian communism, 24.—Primitive agriculture, 24.
CHAPTER II. PROPERTY SYSTEMS AND SOCIAL GROUPS	26
(A) Forms of Appropriation	26
(B) The House Community and the Clan	28
The small-family, 28.—The socialistic theory of the origin of marriage, 28.—Prostitution, 30.—Sexual freedom and its forms, 33.—Other historical stages of sexual life in the socialistic theory, 34.—Legitimate marriage under patriarchal law and its contrasts, 36.
(C) The Evolution of the Family as Conditioned by Economic and non-Economic Factors	37
Primitive economic life; the theory of the three economic stages, 37.—Division of labor between the sexes and types of communalization, 38.—The men's house, 39.—The struggle between patriarchal and matriarchal law, 41.—Group marriage, 43.—Patriarchal authority of the man, 43.

	PAGE
(D) The Evolution of the Clan	43
Types of clans, 43.—Organized and unorganized clans, 44.—History of the clan, 44.—Prophecy and the clan, 45.—Bureaucracy and the clan, 46.
(E) Evolution of the House Community	46
The primitive house community and property relations, 46.—Development into other forms of economic organization, 47.—The patriarchal house community, 47.—Its dissolution, 48.—Monogamy as the exclusive marriage form, 49.
CHAPTER III. THE ORIGIN OF SEIGNIORIAL PROPRIETORSHIP	51
The small-family as point of departure, 51.—Roots of seigniorial proprietorship: Chieftainship, 51.—Conquest of hostile populations, commendation, seigniorial land-settlement and leasing, 52.—Magical charism, 54.—Individual trade, 54.—Fiscal roots of seigniorial proprietorship, various forms, 56.—Individual trade of princes, irrigation culture of the modern orient, 56.—Oikos-economy, 58.—Taxation systems of princes, 58.—Methods of exploiting the taxing power, 59.—Delegation of taxation to chieftain or landed proprietor, 60.—Seigniorial proprietorship in colonial regions, 61.—The occidental, Japanese and Russian feudal systems, 62.
CHAPTER IV. THE MANOR	65
Conditions back of the development of the manor, 65.—Immunity and judicial authority, 65.— Precaria and beneficium , 66.—The manorial holding (Fronhof), 67.—Political ("socage") district (Bannbezirk) and manorial law, 68.—Freedom and unfreedom of the peasant, 69.—Exploitation of the peasant by rent exactions, forms of these, 72.
CHAPTER V. THE POSITION OF THE PEASANTS IN VARIOUS WESTERN COUNTRIES BEFORE THE ENTRANCE OF CAPITALISM	74
France, 74.—Italy, Germany, 75.—England, 77.
CHAPTER VI. CAPITALISTIC DEVELOPMENT OF THE MANOR .	79
(A) The Plantation	79
Types of plantations, 79.—Plantations in antiquity, 80.—The southern states of the U. S. A., 82.
(B) Estate Economy	84
Types of estates, 84.—Stock raising without capital or with little capital, 84.—Intensive capitalistic pas-

CONTENTS

vii

	PAGE
toral economy, 85.—Cereal production in England, 85.—Russia, 86.—Germany, the west, 87—the east and “hereditary dependency,” 89.—Organization of an east-Elbe estate, 90.—Poland and White Russia, 92.
(C) The Dissolution of the Manorial System	92
Causes and Processes of liberation of land and peasants, 92.—Various countries: China, 95;—India, the near east, 96; Japan, 96;—Greece and Rome, 96;—England, 98;—France, 98;—South and west Germany, 99;—East Germany, Austria, 100;—Prussia, 103;—Russia, 106. The present agrarian organization, 108.—Inheritance law, primogeniture, 108,— fidei-commissa and entails, 109.—Political results of the break-up of feudalism, landed aristocracies, 110.—Private property in land, 111.

PART TWO

INDUSTRY AND MINING DOWN TO THE BEGINNING OF THE CAPITALISTIC DEVELOPMENT

CHAPTER VII. PRINCIPAL FORMS OF THE ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY	115
Scope of the concept of industry, 115.—Types of raw-material transformation, 115.—Industry in the house community, division of labor between the sexes, 116.—Specialization and communal labor, 117.—Skilled trades, 117.—Relation of the worker to the market, 118—to the job, 118—to the place of work, 119—to the fixed investment, 120.
CHAPTER VIII. STAGES IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRY AND MINING	122
House industry and tribal industry, 122.—Types of inter-group specialization, castes, 123.—Local specialization, demiurgical labor, 124.—Specialization in village industry and on the feudal manor (Fronhof), 124. On the estate or oikos , 124.—Transition to production to order and for the market, the worker as labor power or as rent-payer, 126.—Shop industry and ergasterion , 126.—Differences in the labor organization of antiquity and of the middle ages, slavery, 130.—Medieval craftsmen and the town, 133—and industrial organizations, 134.

	PAGE
CHAPTER IX. THE CRAFT GUILDS	136
The nature of the guild, 136.—Unfree guilds, 136.—Ritualistic guilds, 137.—Guild policy, internal, 138,—external, 141.—Later products of guild policy, 142.
CHAPTER X. THE ORIGIN OF THE EUROPEAN GUILDS . . .	144
The manorial law theory, 144,—criticized, 145.—Production of skilled craftsmen by the feudal manor, 146.—Free and unfree craftsmen, 147.—Guild, town and town lord, 147.—Livelihood policy of the guilds, 149.—Guild struggles, with rural workers, laborers, merchants, 150.—Guild wars, 151.
CHAPTER XI. DISINTEGRATION OF THE GUILDS AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE DOMESTIC SYSTEM . . .	153
Displacement of the guild, rise of craftsmen to position of merchant and factor, 153.—Subdivision and fusion of guilds, 154.—Relation to importer and exporter, 154.—Domestic industry, its varying development in European countries, 155.—Stages in the development of the domestic or putting-out system, 159.—Domestic industry over the world, 160.
CHAPTER XII. SHOP PRODUCTION. THE FACTORY AND ITS FORE-RUNNERS	162
Forms of shop production, factory and manufactory, 162.—Prerequisites of the factory, steady, mass demand and efficient technology, 163,—supply of free labor, 164.—Fore-runners of the factory in the west, communal establishments, 165, private establishments (early English factories), 167.—New developments through the interaction of specialization and combination of labor and application of non-human power, 169.—The market of the specialized large industry, political demand, luxury demand and substitute luxuries, 169.—Monopoly and state concession as basis of older large-scale industry, 171.—Relation between factory, craft work, domestic industry and machinery, 173.—Results of factory industry for entrepreneur and laborer, 174.—Obstacles to development of shop industry into the modern factory in various countries, 175.
CHAPTER XIII. MINING PRIOR TO THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN CAPITALISM	178
Mining the first field industrialized, 178.—Legal problems, 178.—History of mining law and of mining, earliest mining outside the occident, 179,—Greece, 180,—

CONTENTS

ix

PAGE

Rome and the middle ages, 181.—Germany, 181,—other western countries, 182.—Periods in the history of German mining in the middle ages, 183.—Development of industrial forms down to the appearance of modern capitalism, 186.—Smelteries, 190.—The ore trade, 190. Coal mining, 190.

PART THREE

COMMERCE AND EXCHANGE IN THE PRE-CAPITALISTIC AGE

CHAPTER XIV. POINTS OF DEPARTURE IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF COMMERCE 195

Oldest trade that between ethnic groups, 195.—Peddling, 195.—Trading castes, 195.—The Jews as an outcast commercial class, 196.—Seigniorial trade and its varieties, 196.—Gift trade and trade of princes, 197.

CHAPTER XV. TECHNICAL REQUISITES FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS 199

Primitive transport conditions, 199.—Land transport and its primitive possibilities, 199.—Water transport, 199.—Navigation, 200.—Development of sailing, 200.

CHAPTER XVI. FORMS OF ORGANIZATION OF TRANSPORTATION AND OF COMMERCE 202

(A) The Alien Trader 202

Ocean commerce and piracy, 202.—Merchant shipping of princes and private persons in the ancient world, 202.—Roman conditions, 202.—Shipping and mercantile organization in Greece and Rome, 203.—Legal forms of commerce, 204.—Sea loans in antiquity, 204.—Medieval conditions, 205.—Shipping partnerships and sea loans, 205.—Commenda and societas maris, 206.—The turnover of medieval sea trade, 207.—Land commerce, means of transport, 208.—Turnover, duration of voyage and commercial organization, 209.—Inland shipping in the middle ages, 211.—Protection of the merchant, safe conduct, 212.—Legal protection, reprisal, proxenia, hostage, the hanse, 212.—Settlements of merchants, 213.—Market organization, 214.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
(B) The Resident Trader	215
Town origin of the resident merchant, 215.—Stages in the development, 215.—Retail trade dominant in medieval commerce, 216.—Struggles of the resident trader for monopoly of the town market, 216,—for internal equality of opportunity, 218, prohibition of forestalling, right of sharing, 218.—Street and staple compulsion, 219.—Struggles with consumers, 220.—Beginnings of wholesale trade, 220.
(C) The Trade of the Fairs	220
Nature of the fair, 220.—The fairs of Champagne, 220.—Other fairs, 222.
CHAPTER XVII. FORMS OF COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISE . .	223
Calculability and association of interest, 223.—Position numerals, accounting and the trading company, 223.—The commenda as occasional enterprise, 225.—Origin of permanent organization for commercial enterprise, 226.—Credit and the means of guaranteeing it, house-community and joint liability, 226.—Separation of the property of the company, 228.—The commandite , 229.—Hanseatic company forms, 229.
CHAPTER XVIII. MERCANTILE GUILDS	230
Nature of the mercantile guild, 230.—Local guilds of foreigners in the west, the hanses , 230.—Guilds of resident traders in China and India, 230,—in the west, 232.—History of the occidental guilds, 233.—Commercial policies of guilds, especially the German Hanse, 234.
CHAPTER XIX. MONEY AND MONETARY HISTORY . . .	236
Money and private property, 236.—The functions of money, money as means of payment only, domestic money, 236.—Money as means of accumulation and mark of class distinction, 237.—Money as a general medium of exchange, 238.—Varieties of money, 238.—Valuation of different forms, 239.—The precious metals as the basis of the monetary system, 241.—Coinage, 241.—Technique of coining, 242.—Metallic standards, 243.—History of gold and silver values, eastern Asia and the ancient east, 244.—Rome and the middle ages, 244.—Coinage debasement in the middle ages, 247.—Free coinage, 248.—Increase in overseas production of the precious metals from the 16th century, 248.—Obstacles to the rationalization of money, 250.—Modern monetary policies, 251.

CONTENTS

xi

PAGE

CHAPTER XX. BANKING AND DEALINGS IN MONEY IN THE PRE-CAPITALISTIC AGE 254

Character of the oldest banking transactions, 254.—
Banking in Rome, 256.—Temple banks and state monopolization of banking in antiquity, 256.—Functions of the medieval bank, 258.—Liquidity, establishment of banking monopolies, 260.—The bill of exchange, 261.
—Banking in England, the Bank of England, 263.—
Banking outside of Europe, China and India, 265.

CHAPTER XXI. INTERESTS IN THE PRE-CAPITALISTIC PERIOD 267

Absence or prohibition of interest in early society, 267.
—Evasion of the prohibition, the chattel loan, 268.—
Medieval methods of meeting the need for credit, ecclesiastical prohibition of interest, 269.—The role of the Jews, 270,—of Protestantism, 271.

PART FOUR

THE ORIGIN OF MODERN CAPITALISM

CHAPTER XXII. THE MEANING AND PRESUPPOSITIONS OF MODERN CAPITALISM 275

Capitalism a method of provision for want satisfaction, 275.—Capitalistic supply of everyday requirements peculiar to the occident, 276.—General requisites for the existence of capitalism, 276.—Calculable law, 277.

CHAPTER XXIII. THE EXTERNAL FACTS IN THE EVOLUTION OF CAPITALISM 279

Commercialization, 279.—The stock company, war-loans, 279.—Financing of commercial undertakings, the regulated company, 280.—The great colonial companies, 281.—Financing by the state, administration without a budget, tax farming, 282.—The exchequer, the speciallevy system, 283.—Monopolies, 284.

CHAPTER XXIV. THE FIRST GREAT SPECULATIVE CRISES . 286

Speculation and Crises, 286.—The tulip craze, 286.—
John Law, 286.—England, the South Sea Company, 288.
Later speculative crises, 290.—Capital creation, the age of iron, 290.

CHAPTER XXV. FREE WHOLESALE TRADE 292

Separation of wholesale from retail trade in the 18th century, forms of wholesale organization, 292.—The fair and the exchange, 293.—News service and the wholesale trade, 294.—Commercial organization and transportation, 296.

CHAPTER XXVI. COLONIAL POLICY FROM THE SIXTEENTH TO THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY 298

Accumulation of wealth through colonial exploitation, 298.—Slavery and the slave trade, 299.—Colonial trade and capitalism, 300.—The end of capitalistic exploitation of colonies with abolition of slavery, 300.

CHAPTER XXVII. THE DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRIAL TECH-NIQUE 302

Factory, machine and apparatus, 302.—The earliest true factory in England, 302.—Cotton manufacture crucial in the rationalization and mechanization of work, 303.—Primary role of coal and iron, 304.—Results, liberation of production from the limitations of organic materials and of labor, and from tradition, 305.—The recruiting of the labor force, 306.—The market of the factory, the military demand, 307.—The luxury demand, 309.—Mass demand, 310.—The price revolution of the 16th and 17th centuries, 311.—Inventions, 311.—Characteristics and causes of western capitalism, 312.—Historical conditions of its development, 313.

CHAPTER XXVIII. CITIZENSHIP 315

Citizenship as an economic, political, and social-class concept, 315.—Contributions of the city in various fields of culture, 316.—Various meanings of the term city, 317.—City as a unitary community peculiar to the occident, reasons for this, 318.—Origin in oath of brotherhood, 319.—Rise of cities in the east prevented by peculiarities of military organization, 320.—Irrigation culture and administrative organization, 321.—Obstacles in ideas of magic, 322.—Similarities between cities of antiquity and of the middle ages, 323.—between classical and medieval democracy, 324.—Contrasts between classical and medieval democracy, absence of the guild and guild policy in the former, 326.—Antiquity characterized instead by conflict between landowners and landless, 328,—and by increasing sharpness of class distinctions with growth of democracy, 329.—The ancient city as a political guild with military acquisitive interests, and chronic war as its normal condition, 331.—Contrasts in urban development between south and north in medieval Europe, 332.—The city and capitalism, irrational capitalism, 334.—Rational capitalism a product of the occident since the close of the middle ages, 334.—In antiquity the cities lose their freedom to the bureaucratically organized state and world-empire, which throttled capitalism with compulsory contributions and services, 336.—In modern times they lose it to competing national states which are forced into alliance with capitalism, 336.

CONTENTS

xiii

PAGE

CHAPTER XXIX. THE RATIONAL STATE 338

(A) The State Itself; Law and Officialdom 338

The rational state peculiar to the occident, 338.—Administration by specialists and rational law, 339.—Roman law, rationalization of procedure through interaction with canon law, 340.—Revival of Roman law and capitalism, 341.—Historical descent of characteristic institutions of capitalism, 342.—Formalistic law and capitalism, 342.

(B) The Economic Policy of the Rational State 343

Fiscal interests and public welfare the two types of state economic policy before the development of mercantilism, 343.—Obstruction of deliberate economic policy in the east by ritualism, caste, and clan, 344.—The occident, beginnings of economic policy on the part of rulers under the Carolingians, 345.—Economic policy of the Church, especially of the monasteries, 345.—The Emperor and the territorial princes, 346.—England, 347.

(C) Mercantilism 347

Nature and significance of mercantilism, 347.—Its program, 347.—England distinctively its home, 348.—Two forms of mercantilism, (a) class-monopolies, 349,—(b) nationalistic mercantilism, 350.—Development of capitalism in England alongside mercantilism; capitalism and Puritanism, 351.—End of English mercantilism, 351.

CHAPTER XXX. THE EVOLUTION OF THE CAPITALISTIC SPIRIT 352

Neither population growth nor importation of precious metals crucial in creating western capitalism, 352.—External conditions of its development, 354.—Rationalistic economic ethic decisive, 354.—History of economic ethics; at the beginning, traditionalism, stereotyping of conduct, 354.—Intensification of traditionalism by material interests and by magic, 355.—Traditionalism not overcome by the economic impulse alone, 355.—Breakdown of opposition of internal and external ethics, 356.—Capitalism necessarily arises in a region with an ethical theory hostile to it, 357.—Economic ethics of the Church, 357.—The Jews had no part in the creation of modern capitalism, 358.—Judaism gave Christianity its hostility to magic, 360.—Overthrow of magic by rational prophecy, 362.—Prophecy absent in China, in India created a religious aristocracy, 362.—Judaism and Christianity plebeian religions, 363.—Significance of asceticism for rationalization of life, Tibet, medieval monasticism, 364.—Diffusion of the old religious asceticism over the worldly life by the Reformation, 365.—The Protestant conception of the calling, and capitalism, 367.—Protestant-ascetic economic ethics stripped of its religious import by the Enlightenment; social consequences, 368.

NOTES	371
INDEX OF NAMES	383
SUBJECT INDEX	385