

Contents

List of tables	viii
Acknowledgements	xii
Introduction	1
Introduction	1
Crisis in public service media? The commercialization of the media industries	3
Understanding media systems and internationally comparative research: towards a comprehensive review of empirical news studies	7
Chapter-by-chapter outline	13
1 The philosophy and economics of different broadcast models: how do funding models and regulatory frameworks shape the democratic value of news?	17
Introduction	17
The philosophy and economics of broadcasting: defining the theory and practice of public service media	18
Impartiality and regulatory bodies: shaping the production of broadcast journalism	28
Post-broadcasting future? Building and regulating online public service news media in the digital age	36
2 Journalism cultures and public service ethics: evaluating the democratic value of news	43
Introduction	43
News, professional journalism and public service ethics: beyond the enforcement of top-down regulation	45
Journalism, news values and informed citizenship: understanding the democratic value of news	49
Towards a healthy democratic news culture? Interpreting pluralism in information-rich societies	54
Measuring the democratic value of news: the methodological tools behind empirical studies	58

3	Reflecting a "window on the world"? Reporting local, national and international news	62
	Introduction	62
	The balance of "soft" and "hard" news on competing media systems: longitudinal trends in an era of deregulation and commercialization	64
	Contemporary news values: which stories typically make and shape agendas on public and market-driven media systems?	73
	A "window on the world"? Comparing local, national and international news on different media systems	80
	The democratic promise of the Internet: have public or market-driven media systems internationalized their news agendas or embraced citizen journalism in the online era?	86
	Conclusions	89
4	Making sense of elections: the journalistic conventions and practices of campaign reporting	93
	Introduction	93
	The contemporary nature of election coverage: comparing how politics is framed on competing media systems	98
	Old politics, new media: exploring the differences in public and market-driven reporting of the televised leaders' debates and elections online	109
	Beyond national news and presidential/prime ministerial campaigns: comparing coverage of "second order elections" on competing media systems	115
	Conclusions	121
5	Between patriotism and independence: the politics of reporting wars and conflicts	125
	Introduction	125
	Making sense of conflict and terrorism: the framing of post-9/11 and subsequent wars on public and market-driven media systems	128
	Reporting the war in Iraq: making sense of global news nationally on competing media systems	134
	A threat to impartiality? How embedded journalists on different media systems reported the 2003 war in Iraq	142
	Conclusions	147

6	Adapting to the 24/7 environment of journalism: the evolution and development of rolling news channels	150
	Introduction	150
	The commercial dominance of rolling journalism: drawing an empirical map of commercial and public service 24-hour news channels	154
	Global 24-hour news warfare: comparing the "windows on the world" of competing media systems	162
	Branding "fair and balanced" journalism: how have public and market-driven rolling news channels evolved around the world?	167
	The rise of live and "breaking news" coverage: does the need for speed compromise the quality of journalism on different media systems?	172
	Conclusions	178
7	Protecting the democratic value of news: why public service media matter	182
	Introduction	182
	The impact of different media systems: comparing empirical studies of public knowledge, civic participation and audience trust	182
	The systemic impact of public service values: upholding editorial standards in an increasingly commercialized media landscape	192
	Market power, journalism and impartiality: the production of news in an increasingly deregulated environment	196
	Safeguarding editorial independence: how public service values inform audience trust and engagement	199
	From normative values to empirical judgements: why public service media matter	203
	Notes	207
	Bibliography	210
	Index	235