Reading Children's Literature: A Critical Introduction emerged out of our experiences teaching introductory children's literature courses to undergraduates. In most literature courses at the college level, students enter the course with few preconceptions about the material they are about to study. In our children's literature courses, however, we found that students were familiar with many of the titles, typically filtered through film adaptations, and often held assumptions about both children and children's books that interfered with their ability to think critically about either. These conditions required special care in designing our courses. Moreover, given the significance of audience to the study of children's literature and the fact that children's literature is almost entirely omitted from other literature courses, including both broad surveys and courses on literary analysis, we found ourselves with the added tasks of introducing students to the histories of childhood and children's literature and to the unique problems involved with analyzing works written by adults for children. Reading Children's Literature: A Critical Introduction seeks to lay the groundwork needed for productive discussions about literary works for children.

Readers of this book have come to a children's literature course at an exciting time, when studying this literature rigorously is especially important. Books for children and young adults are currently among the most widely read and discussed both inside and outside the academy, and many highly honored literary works for youth have been published or revisited in recent years. In addition, education, literacy, the importance of the creative arts, and the content of children's culture are among the most charged and important social issues today. While scholars have a solid foundation from which to investigate children's literature, the field remains wide open to important new discoveries and projects.

This book reflects both the history of children's literature studies and its more recent developments. Francelia Butler founded Children's Literature, the first scholarly journal devoted to the subject, in 1972; Anne Devereaux Jordan helped establish the Children's Literature Association (ChLA) in 1973; and the first annual ChLA convention was held the following year. Since those beginnings, the study of children's literature has not
