

Contents

1	The Orbital Internet and the Threat to Astronomy	1
2	The Diplomacy of Science in a Time of Geopolitical Change	5
2.1	The Building Blocks of détente in the Global Commons	7
2.2	Scientific Cooperation and Consultation as Mechanisms of détente	10
2.3	The Role of Consultation Beyond the Cold War Era	12
2.4	Cooperation and Competition in Space Exploration and Astronomy	15
2.5	Concluding Remarks	17
	References	18
3	The Outer Space Treaty and Responsibility Under International Law	21
3.1	The Race for Control of the Orbital Internet	22
3.2	American Technology Giants and the Quest for Full Spectrum Dominance	25
3.3	The Impact of Interference with Science Is Borne by Science	30
3.4	State Responsibility for Commercial Space Activities	36
3.5	Due Regard, the Precautionary Approach, and the Prevention Principle	41
3.6	A Fundamental Right to the Stars?	46
3.7	Concluding Remarks	51
	References	53
4	Establishing a Governance Framework for the Orbital Internet in Outer Space	57
4.1	The Tragedy of the Commons	59
4.2	Treating LEO as a Finite Resource	61
4.3	A New Model of “International Regulatory Coordination”	66

4.4	Bolstering National Processes for Authorisation, Supervision, and Consultation	67
4.5	Recommendations for National Regulatory Reform	70
4.6	Concluding Remarks	72
	References	74
5	Towards Temperance Through Proportionality	77
5.1	Challenges to the Concept of Outer Space as a Global Commons	81
5.2	Proportionality and “Abuse of Rights” in International Law	88
5.3	Good Night Dark Sky?	92
5.4	Corporations and Concerned Citizens Come to the Defence of Science	99
5.5	Reinvigorating the Diplomacy of Science in Europe	110
5.6	Temperance as a Balancing Act	118
5.7	Concluding Remarks	121
	References	122
6	A New Regulatory Framework for Mega-Constellations	125
	References	132
Appendix		133
	The Outer Space Treaty (1967)	133
	Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies (1967)	133