

Contents

List of figures and tables	viii
Acknowledgements	ix
1 Introduction	1
2 On the social work–social policy interface	13
3 The environments	41
4 Opportunity	61
5 Facilitation	81
6 Motivation	102
7 Explaining the policy engagement of social workers and beyond	120
Notes	131
References	132
Index	167

We are extremely grateful to our colleagues Professor Stefan Köpcke at The University of Applied Sciences of Eastern Switzerland and Dr Riccardo Galdi at the University of Pisa for both hosting us and participating actively in our research on social work, social policy and the interface between them during our stays. We are also grateful to Stéphane Beuchat, Tobias Kindler, Maria-Asunción Martínez-Román and Simone von Wartnawyl for sharing their unique perspectives on the policy engagement of social workers with us. In addition, we want to thank our students, ranging from undergraduate through to doctoral, for the dialogue with them that raised questions and contributed thoughts and ideas that enriched our thinking and contributed to the book. Similarly, we have learnt much from the many social workers that we have met over the last decades in Israel and elsewhere who expressed an interest in the topic of our work – social workers as policy actors – and who told us of their own experiences and the factors that impacted their efforts to influence policy.

As always, it has been a pleasure working with the team at Policy Press. The professional input of Isobel Pantou, Emma Cook and Helen Pluton have all made the process of publishing this book much less complicated than it could have been. Thanks are also due to Professor Anna Gupta, John's co-editor of the Research in Social Work series, who facilitated the inclusion of the book in a rapidly growing series of books.

Finally, thanks to Eli Dvash and Anat Hegan for their help in preparing the book and its content for publication.