

Contents

Foreword Ellen Kennedy xv

Translator's Preface xvii

An Introduction to Carl Schmitt's Constitutional Theory: Issues and Context Jeffrey Seitzer and Christopher Thornhill 1

CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY

Schmitt's Preface 53

Part I. Concept of the Constitution 57

§ 1. Absolute Concept of the Constitution (The Constitution as Unified Whole) 59

I. Constitution as the collective condition of concrete unity and order or as state form ("form of forms")—or as the principle of the formation of the political unity 59

II. Constitution in the normative sense ("norm of norms") 62

§ 2. Relative Concept of the Constitution (The Constitution as a Multitude of Individual Laws) 67

I. Dissolution of the constitution into constitutional laws 67

II. The written constitution 68

III. Qualified alterability as a formal characteristic of constitutional law 71

§ 3. The Positive Concept of the Constitution (The Constitution as the Complete Decision over the Type and Form of the Political Unity) 75

I. The constitution as the act of the constitution-making power 75

II. The constitution as political decision—Decisions of the Weimar Constitution—Practical significance of the distinction between constitution and constitutional law (constitutional amendment, inviolability of the constitution, basic rights, constitutional disputes, oath to the constitution, high treason) 77

III. The compromise character of the Weimar Constitution, genuine and apparent compromises (school and church compromise) 82

§ 4. Ideal Concept of the Constitution ("Constitution" in an exemplary sense, thus named because of a certain content)	89
I. Ambiguity of the ideal concept, in particular freedom	89
II. The ideal concept of the constitution of the bourgeois Rechtsstaat	90
III. Both components of the modern constitution	93
§ 5. The Meanings of the Term "Basic Law," Basic Norm or Lex Fundamental ^{is} (Summarizing Overview)	94
I. Nine meanings of the word basic law	94
II. Connections between the different meanings	94
III. In this book, constitution means constitution in the positive sense	96
§ 6. Origin of the Constitution	97
I. A constitution arises either through one-sided political decision of the subject of the constitution-making power or through reciprocal agreement of several such subjects	97
II. Historical overview of the origins of the modern European constitutions (1. medieval feudal state and state of estates, in particular the Magna Carta; 2. the German Reich until 1806; 3. the state of the absolute princes; 4. the Revolution of 1789; 5. the monarchical restoration 1815–1830; 6. the July Revolution 1830; 7. the constitutional monarchy in Germany; 8. North German Federation 1867 and German Reich 1871; 9. the Weimar Constitution 1919)	97
§ 7. The Constitution as Contract (The Genuine Constitutional Contract)	112
I. Distinction between the so-called state or social contract from the constitutional contract	112
II. The genuine constitutional contract as federal contract. Non-genuine constitutional contracts inside a political unity	113
III. The genuine constitutional contract as status contract (criticism of the principle: pacta sunt servanda)	117
IV. Constitution and international law contracts	120
§ 8. The Constitution-Making Power	125
I. The constitution-making power as political will	125
II. The subject of the constitution-making power (God, people or nation, king, an organized group)	126
III. Initiation of the constitution-making power, in particular the democratic practice (national assembly, convention, plebiscite)	130
§ 9. Legitimacy of a Constitution	136
I. Types of constitutional legitimacy	136

II. Legitimacy of a constitution does not mean that a constitution originated according to previously valid constitutional laws 136

III. Dynastic and democratic legitimacy 138

§ 10. Consequences of the Theory of the Constitution-Making Power, of the People's Constitution-Making Power in Particular 140

I. Continuous presence (permanence) of the constitution-making power 140

II. Continuity of the state during the elimination and statutory violation of the constitution, to the extent that only the constitution-making power remains unchanged 141

III. The problem of the continuity in the change of the subject of the constitution-making power (constitutional elimination), in particular the continuity of the German Reich in 1918/19 142

IV. Distinction of the people's constitution-making power from every constituted authority, specifically that based on constitutional law 145

§ 11. Concepts Derived from the Concept of the Constitution (Constitutional Change, Statutory Violation of the Constitution, Constitutional Suspension, Constitutional Dispute, High Treason) 147

I. Overview 147

II. Changes of the constitution involving constitutional laws (revision and amendment of the constitution), boundaries of the authority for constitutional amendment, statutory violations of the constitution and doubtful acts of sovereignty, suspension of the constitution 148

III. Constitutional disputes 158

IV. The constitution as an object of attack and protection during high treason 164

Part II. The Rechtsstaat Component of the Modern Constitution 167

§ 12. The Principles of the Bourgeois Rechtsstaat 169

I. Distinction between the Rechtsstaat and political components of the modern constitution; both principles of the bourgeois Rechtsstaat: basic rights (principle of distribution) and separation of powers (organizational principle) 169

II. The concept of the Rechtsstaat and individual distinguishing marks (legality, administrative jurisdiction, definability of all state authorizations, independence of judges, conformity to judicial forms, problem of political justice) 172

§ 13. The Rechtsstaat Concept of Law 181

I. Law and statute in the bourgeois Rechtsstaat 181

II. The so-called formal concept of law 184

III. The political concept of law	187
IV. The meaning of the general character of the legal norm	191
§ 14. The Basic Rights	197
I. Historical Overview	197
II. Historical and legal significance of the declaration of rights	200
III. Substantive distribution of the basic rights	202
IV. Institutional guarantees are distinguishable from basic rights	208
V. In the bourgeois Rechtsstaat, basic duties are nothing more than constitutional law obligations	212
VI. Division of the basic rights in regard to the protection against limitations and intrusions	213
§ 15. Separation (So-Called Division) of Powers	220
I. The historical origin of the separation of powers theory	220
II. Separation and balancing of powers; schema of their strict separation; schema of a few attempts at balancing	223
§ 16. Bourgeois Rechtsstaat and Political Form	235
I. The constitution of the modern bourgeois Rechtsstaat is always a mixed constitution; state forms become forms of separated and divided powers (legislative, executive)	235
II. The two principles of political form (identity and representation)	239
III. Concept of representation	242
IV. The modern constitution as a linkage between and mixture of bourgeois Rechtsstaat principles with principles of political form	249
Part III. The Political Component of the Modern Constitution	253
§ 17-1. The Theory of Democracy, Fundamental Concepts	255
I. Overview of a few conceptual definitions	255
II. The concept of equality (general human equality, substantive equality)	257
III. Definition of democracy	264
§ 18. The People and the Democratic Constitution	268
I. The people anterior to and superior to the constitution	268
II. The people within the constitution (elections and votes)	268
III. The people compared with the constitutional regime (public opinion)	271
IV. Overview of the meanings of the word "people" for a modern constitutional theory	279
§ 19. Consequences of the Political Principle of Democracy	280

I. General tendencies	280
II. The state citizen in democracy	280
III. Officials (democratic methods for the selection of officials and civil servants)	283
§ 20. Application of the Political Principle of Democracy to Individual Areas of State Life	286
I. Democracy and legislation (in particular referendum and initiative)	286
II. Democracy and government (especially production of direct relations between government and people)	291
III. Democracy and relations among states under international law	295
IV. Democracy and administration	297
V. Democracy and the judiciary	299
§ 21. Boundaries of Democracy	302
I. Boundaries of the principle of identity	302
II. Boundaries stemming from the nature of the people	302
III. Boundaries of the practice of contemporary democracy	303
IV. Critique of the principle "majority decides"	303
§ 22-2. The Theory of Monarchy	308
I. Foundations of monarchy (theocratic, patriarchal, patrimonial, civil servant, and Caesarist forms)	308
II. The significance in constitutional theory terms of the different justifications of monarchy	311
III. The position of the monarch in the modern constitution	313
IV. The state president in a republican constitution	315
§ 23-3. Aristocratic Elements in Modern Bourgeois-Rechtsstaat Constitutions	318
I. The aristocratic principle as a means of the separation of powers	318
II. Idea of and justification for the two-chamber system	318
III. The historical types of the two-chamber system (upper house, house of lords, senate, house of states)	320
IV. The jurisdiction of and grants of authority to the upper house	323
V. Incompatibility of double membership	327
§ 24-4. The Parliamentary System	328
I. Ambiguity of the term "parliamentarianism," especially the four subtypes (presidential, parliament, premier, and cabinet system)	328
II. The ideal foundations of the parliamentary system (historical situation of the bourgeoisie, education and property, public discussion)	331

III. Practical consequences of the fundamental idea of the parliamentary system (representation, the public, discussion) 338

§ 25. Historical Overview of the Development of the Parliamentary System 343

I. Most important dates of the historical development in England 343

II. The course of development in France and Belgium 348

III. The course of development in Germany 351

§ 26. Overview of the Possibilities for the Formation of the Parliamentary System 359

I. Decisive consideration: agreement between parliament and government 359

II. Means of producing the agreement 359

III. "Instances" of parliamentary responsibility (cabinet collapses) 359

§ 27. The Parliamentary System of the Weimar Constitution 362

I. The linkage of the four subsystems 362

II. Overview 363

III. The practice of the parliamentary systems of the Weimar Constitution. 1. The confidence of the Reichstag (Art. 54, 1 and 2); 2. "the Chancellor determines policy guidelines" (Art. 56); 3. the cabinet system; 4. the presidential system 364

§ 28. Dissolution of Parliament 373

I. Types of dissolution (monarchical, presidential, ministerial, self-dissolution, dissolution in response to an initiative) 373

II. The President's dissolution authority 375

Part IV. Constitutional Theory of the Federation 379

§ 29. Fundamental Concepts of a Constitutional Theory of the Federation 381

I. Overview of the types of interstate relations and connections (international legal community, individual relations, alliance, federation) 381

II. Consequences of the conceptual definition of the federation (pacification, guarantee, intervention, execution) 385

III. The legal and political antimonies of the federation and their elimination through the requirement of homogeneity 388

§ 30. Consequences of the Fundamental Concepts of the Constitutional Theory of the Federation 396

I. Every federation as such has a political existence with an independent jus belli 396

II. Every federation as such is a subject in terms of international as well as public law 396

III. Every federation has a federation territory	399
IV. Federation representation, institutions and officials, federal jurisdiction	400
V. Treasonous undertakings against the federation	403
VI. Democracy and federalism (especially Art. 18)	404

Appendix: The Weimar Constitution	409
-----------------------------------	-----

Notes	441
-------	-----

Biographical Notes	464
--------------------	-----

Index	465
-------	-----