The Visegrad Group, consisting of Poland, Hungary, Slovakia and the Czech Republic, plays a key role in the security architecture of Central Europe. Established in 1991 as a response to the geopolitical changes following the collapse of the Soviet Union, the V4 aimed to promote European integration and regional cooperation. In the context of internal security, the V4 is a unique example of cooperation between countries with a common history but with different approaches to many political and social issues.

Internal security refers to the protection of a state and its citizens from internal threats such as terrorism and organized crime.
