THE NON-ALIGNED MOVEMENT - SIXTY YEARS
SINCE THE BELGRADE SUMMIT

In the modern period of development of international relations, the international community is going through extreme uncertainties and dangers of re-grouping and military-political realignments which increases the negative effects on a number of aspects of international relations. The nature of the crisis is deepening and now once again, just as they were during the Cold War between the two military-political blocs of the West and the East, internal turmoil with uncertain outcomes is intensifying, and the increased tension between the United States and its allies on the one hand and Russia and China and their allies on the other does not contribute to a positive and balanced consolidation of international relations, but rather to its imbalance and destabilisation. The lack of uniform solutions to crucial economic problems in the relations between the countries of the North and the South also does not contribute to general development, but to social stagnation, poverty and decline. The situation presented the international community with a slew of additional problems, including environmental, health and cultural issues, which, combined with the negative consequences of revolutionary technical and technological changes, leave the world without perspective, i.e. without concrete answers and achievable and sustainable solutions. In the changed geopolitical circumstances and with the abundance of contradictory economic tendencies leading to the globalisation of the world economy and the multilateralisation of international political relations, the preservation of international peace and security remains the most important objective, or further progress and prosperity of all mankind.

The Non-Aligned Movement, in this sense, is once again becoming an important factor in the international community's efforts to build a fairer and more democratic international order. Created as an antithesis to the politics of power and bloc division of the world, the Non-Aligned
